The Rediscovered Country (1915)

Synopsis

Stewart Edward White (1873 – 1946) was a noted African big game hunter, explorer, outdoorsman, American writer, novelist, and spiritualist. In 1910-11 Stewart Edward White, Mrs. White, and famous big game hunter R. J. Cuninghame, with a small safari of forty men "rediscovered" a tract of country lying on the German side of a barrier of mountains between British and German East Africa, and in this book he gives us his diary and notes of safari – elephant, antelope, rhinoceros, lion. THINK of starting out fearlessly under the tropical heat of the African July sun, with a gun over your shoulder, a few trusty colored guides, and a pack of stubborn lazy donkeys to carry your provisions, add to that the knowledge that you are going into a country hitherto unknown, and you have a picture of the beginning of Stewart Edward White's 1910 trip into German East Africa – an adventure no longer left in its freshness for any explorer. For although the territory which Mr. White visited will remain perfect in its wildness for many years to come, the man who now enters it will not have to blaze his own trail, or seek those made by the rhinoceros, buffalo or other animal inhabitants of these unknown woods; for the author-adventurer has done this much for him. He describes how in his 1915 book, The Rediscovered Country. While South Africa, Nyassaland, Rhodesia, British East Africa and portions of the Congo, Uganda, and the Sudan all were well known, no hunter had penetrated into the part of German East Africa which lies between Lake Natron and Lake Victoria Nyanza. It is a big country, running from the British boundary southward for several hundred miles. A high range of mountains hems it in on the Anglo-German boundary. "Never have I seen anything like that game. It covered every hill, standing in the openings, strolling in and out among the groves, feeding on the bottom lands, singly, or in little groups. It did not matter in which direction I looked, there it was; as abundant one place as another. Nor did it matter how far I went, over how many hills I walked, how many wide prospects I examined, it was always the same. During my stay at the next two camps I looked over fifty square miles. One day I counted 4,628 head! And suddenly I realized again that in this beautiful, wide, populous country, no sportsman's rifle has ever been fired. It is a virgin game country, and I have been the last man who will ever discover one for the sportsmen of the world. There is no other available possibility for such a game field in Africa unexplored. I moved among those hordes of unsophisticated beasts as a lord of Eden would have moved." There are many unusual descriptions of dangerous huntings – several lion hunts and notably one of how the author killed four lions at once, as exciting as any fiction story. But perhaps the most remarkable is that of an elephant hunt which lasted for days. The silent cautious following of a great beast who could have killed any one of the men by a single stamp of his foot; how they saw him join a herd, and the skillful maneuvering they had to do in order to keep the pack off their scent; and finally how they brought him to death. In its thorough knowledge of the actions and habits of this great jungle king the tale is reminiscent of Kipling's Jungle Book. An enjoyable true story about exploring and hunting in Tanzania (German East Africa) in the early 1900's. The story follows the exploits of two hunters looking to hunt in an new area (the rediscovered country). The story would be considered "politically incorrect" as it is written by the white hunters based on the thinking of the time. Animals are killed daily for meat and subsistence. The end of the books consists of how to put together your own hunting expedition which was fascinating. Everything you need for hunting including clothes, who to contact, number of porters etc. is listed and detailed. The book would be interesting for those who want to learn about Africa of that time and the relationship between the different races.

This book takes you back to the old Africa when game was plentiful and safari life was filled with new discoveries every day. Written with the same love of the hunt you may remember from Roosevelt and the pure joy of experiencing unknown lands, you will be drawn from page to page with the thrill of chance encounters with lion, Buffalo and rhino. Truly an exhilarating journey in the wilds on the untamed Africa of the past!

As usual, Mr. White provides an interesting tale of early 20th Century safari life in a part of Africa where no white man had spent any great deal of time.

Wanting badly to give this book 5 stars, I felt compelled to back off a bit in consideration of others of its kind. This genre of African adventure has such wonderful books that set a very high standard.

True safari adventure into African hinterland with interesting social cultural info as well as hunting historical interest. Also well written, but lacking in detail at times. Unfortunately some racist, elitist views expressed that were typical of the time

This is an excellent book. It has well described scenes which relate to today as much as they did back then. Thoroughly recommend this book.

This was an excellent read! Their adventures are quite detailed and well written.

Very good. Historically informative.
